

Dream CIX

A door appeared before me. The beige wooden frame illuminated by the yellowish light from above. Going through the door, I was presented with a metallic staircase leading down into a low illuminated area below, with a faint blue hue to it. Stepping down into the room below, the walls on the side of the stairs slowly transitioned from orange drywall to natural limestone. Opening up into a large cavern far beneath the surface.

My steps rattled onto the gated floor beneath me. The large open cavern was somehow traversable with a series of connected stairs and bridges made of steel and gated floors. The source of the illumination coming from a series of lights attached to the railings surrounding the interconnected passages. The floor beneath revealing the darkness below, somehow consuming the series of lights from above, essentially an abyss waiting for its meal behind steel bars.

What did capture my attention was the giant glowing capsule in the center of the web of steel. Its contents containing an opaque liquid behind the tinted blue glass. I had to go up to it, one with any curiosity would have done the same. Whatever the reason behind this construct being made inside of an abyss beneath this building had to have been because of this one capsule that now seemed to be around ten feet in height. I walked up to the glass, staring into the liquid. Slowly mesmerized by the flow of the liquid's current, revealing a pattern-like ripple within. As I stared into the liquid I felt as though I could make out some figure within. I was honestly surprised. With how opaque the liquid was, I didn't think I would see anything beneath its surface, so I strained my eyes and inched ever closer to hopefully get a clearer view of the figure. Maybe it was just my imagination, but I swear that the figure was coming closer and closer to the glass, catching my full attention.

Alas, my trance was broken as a voice called out to me from the stairs leading back into the building. It was the director's assistant. They needed me to film the next scene back upstairs in the courtyard, so on I went never looking back at the capsule and never learning what was at its center.