

The Foolish Five & The Missing Plant

The dream began in the evening at a two-story elementary school building. I was in a classroom helping another teacher with a dozen students. She was blonde, wearing a black top and long skirt, with black heels. The students were wearing the school uniform of a white button-up and black bottoms. They were just playing around in the open classroom, semi-circle in shape, as it protruded slightly from the side of the building. We were keeping the kids company after school, till their parents were able to come pick them up once work was done.

One of the students, a girl with black hair, was looking out of the window towards the now pinkish-blue sky. She wanted to then let in some air by opening the window, so she went ahead to attempt to unlock it. Although the lock was stuck, and the force she was currently using wasn't making it budge. So, she decided to use both her hands and her entire body to try to pull the switch unlocked with as much force as she could. What instead unfolded, was that the lock instead broke off its hinge, causing the girl to fall back wildly. At this moment, her arms flung outwards as well, and her left arm crashed through the window, shattering the glass, as she fell back down to the floor.

Both the teacher and I ran towards the girl to see if she was ok. As I helped to get her back on her feet, her left arm was sliced and pierced by the shards of glass from the window. Her wounds began to gush blood as she tried her hardest to fight back tears from the pain. I was able to find a nearby towel to help apply pressure to her arm and mitigate the flow of blood. I then went ahead to signal the teacher to go retrieve the first aid kit from the nurse's office, as I had to stay here to help out the girl and look after the remaining kids.

After a while, the teacher returned back in the room with the first aid kit and knelt down to help out the girl. Before I left her to treat the girl, she whispered in my ear that, our patron has an urgent problem she wants to discuss with me immediately. After, giving my goodbyes to the students, I walked out of the room with my phone already in hand. If our patron was calling us for help, then there was no time to waste. What could have gotten her to be so distressed?

A police car pulled into the back parking lot of a lone gas station out on the side of the highway. Parked just outside the range of the singular lone white light from the lamp at the station. Swinging the driver's door open, a person stepped out. Their black leather boots stomped upon the graveled ground. Baggy leather pants, and a large leather coat, with many metal pins and chains hanging off of them. The large hood obscured most of their head, and they wore a neck scarf covering their face from the top of their nose down, with sunglasses, yes even in the dead of night. They walked towards the back of the car, throwing open the truck. Inside was stuffed with a bunch of random police gear that seemed to have just been thrown hastily in. They went ahead and threw everything out onto the ground. Tasers, vests, handcuffs, batons, riot shields, and firearms, all were thrown onto the ground, as what they were looking for was buried at the bottom of it all. A long black case. They grabbed it by the handle and walked up towards one of the rear passenger doors. As they opened the door, inside the back seat, paws tied and snout muzzled, was a german shepherd K9 with a vest on bearing the regalia of the police force. It was currently lying on its side, struggling as much as it could to try to move in its constraints, but the efforts seemed futile. The masked person placed down the large case onto the seat. Opening it up, it was impossible to tell from the K9's perspective what was inside, but the masked person was fiddling with whatever was in there. After a moment, they raised up a syringe with a purple bubbly fluid inside it. They then, proceeded to move the large case to the side so that they can get closer to the K9, who figured out what the person's intention was and started to wiggle more ferociously on the seat to try for a miracle in which it can escape. The masked person was getting annoyed as to how much the K9 was moving and used its free hand to thrust down onto the neck of the K9 and ceasing its movements drastically, especially on the upper part of its body, as they kept a strong grip on the K9 to keep it still. Easily, the syringe pierced through the K9's skin as it whimpered from the action, and the masked person slowly injected the purple fluid into the K9's bloodstream. Once emptied, they removed the syringe and observed the K9. Its blood vessels from around its body were pulsating and the K9 itself was convulsing even more through muscle spasms throughout, as its mouth began to froth white foam. The masked person stood waiting. Staring at the K9's response. Once the K9's body slowly stopped moving, the masked person started to close the door, but before they could fully do so, the K9 returned back to life with a yelp. The masked person swung the door wide open to see the new and improved K9 that appeared before them.

But in the meantime, this is where this dream ends & the title might not make much sense now as this was only like halfway through the dream, but maybe it'll be continued at another date.